Introduction

Dear Reader!

A grandmaster from Belarus (please, do not confuse it with Russia!) is working for you. We may know each other from previous books or articles. Belarus is a country in Eastern Europe, located between Poland and Russia.

As always, the technical part of the work has been performed by my wife Tatiana (WIM), and the Russian-English translation has been done by our daughter Eva. You might have also met them at some tournaments.

So, now to the subject itself. As is known, according to the rules of chess, a pawn captures “diagonally, one square forward (to the left or right)”. Thus, after a capture, let us say, $g7 \times f6$, already two black pawns may appear on the f-file ($f7+f6$). In addition, we shall keep in mind that pawns are the only pieces that cannot go back, so a “defect” like that may last a long time.

In this book I will present typical structures, arising from different openings, and we will try to figure out whether doubled pawns are a weakness, or if everything is not so clear.

Attention, please! This is not about mastering opening nuances, but about only showing plans of the struggle in different structures with doubled pawns.

It is not very popular to defend the central pawn with a bishop. The line is quite viable, but Black will almost surely lose the advantage of the two bishops while the doubled pawns remain on the board. All of these titanic struggles took place on the shores of the Ionian Sea. In all of them, White enjoyed comfortable play which however could not always be converted to the full point.

It turns out that Black does not have any compensation for the doubled pawns. With a large number of pieces still on the board, opposite-color bishops

S.Kasparov-Karl, Citta di Arco 2015. The queen maneuver ♞d8-e7-e5-c5-a7-b8 looks artificial, doesn't it?

The better pawn structure heralds comfortable play for White. 8...♞e7
9.♞bd2 Please note that with the pawn on c6, the knight does not want to go to c3 as it will feel hemmed in. 9...♞e6

10.♞ad1 The rook protects the queen on d4 before the knight leaps to c4. Perhaps the prophylactic 10.♞c3 is better.

The queen vacates the d4-square for the knight and gets away from the opposition with major enemy pieces. matter. One should not hurry to improve the state of his opponent’s pawns. I would say, a more logical option is 23.h3 f5 24.hxg4 hxg4 25.fxg4 fxg4 26.e5 with the initiative. 23...cxd6 24.♖f1 ♖c7 25.h4 ♖g8 26.fxg4 ♖xg4 27.♖f5 c5 28.♖d2 ♖gxe4?! This looks very impressive as White obtains two connected passed pawns. 32...♖xa2 33.♖xf6?! 33.h5! is more accurate, 33...♖a1+ 34.♖g2±, and the black rook has to rush headlong to the seventh/eighth ranks via e1. 33...♖a1 34.♖f2 a5 35.g4 As usual, time-trouble errors begin. 35.♖h2! 35...♖h1+ 36.♖g3 b5 37.g5? 37.h5 a4 38.♖g2 ♖h4 39.♖g3 ♖h1 40.♖g2 would have led to a draw. 37...b4?! 38.cxb4 axb4

In the following game, the Ukrainian grandmaster’s handling of the simple major-piece ending was a model. I had an opportunity to play against him earlier, and even in his youth, Anton was quite a strong player, while now his level is around a 2700 Elo rating. So, Korobov hid his king behind the doubled pawns neatly and then launched a queenside offensive. In the meantime, he did not allow White to organize the advance of his pawns on the opposite flank.

The situation has simplified even more. Let us see how the knight will fight against the bishop. 16...g6 17.♖ad1 0-0-0 18.♗b3 b6 19.c4 c5! Otherwise the white pawn will continue to advance, damaging Black's pawn structure. 20.e5!? A positional sacrifice aimed at getting a perfect blocking point for the knight. 20...fxe5 21.♗d2 ♖c6 22.♗e4 ♗e7

White would be doing well if only his opponent would not be constantly threatening to infiltrate of one of the major pieces to d4. 23.♖xd8+ ♖xd8 24.♗c3 ♖d4 24...♖e6!? 25.♖xe5 ♖f6 26.♖e2 This looks like aggressive intentions. The Turkish grandmaster is likely to have hoped to take advantage of the defects in the enemy's pawn structure. The following leads to a balanced position: 26.♖xf6

♗xf6 27.b3 ♖d7=. 26...♗d6 27.♗e4 ♖e5 28.♗xd6+ ♖xd6 29.♖f3 ♖b8 30.♖e1 ♗a7 31.b3 31.♖e8? does not work, 31...♖d1+, and Black's attack comes first. 31...b5 with a counterplay.

Please note that the doubled pawns are quite good, protecting the black king both diagonally and horizontally. Meanwhile, the centralized positions of the queen and the rook create opportunities for a queenside offensive where Black has a numerical pawn superiority. 32.cxb5 White should not have captured on b5, maintaining the compactness of the black pawns. 32.g3 bxc4 33.bxc4 ♖xc4 34.♖e8; 32.♖f7!? 32...axb5 33.g3 ♖b6 34.a4 c6 35.axb5 cx b5 36.♖h2 ♖d2 37.b4

37...cx b4 38.♖f7?? After 38.♖e4, the situation remains unclear.
